Let me see: this is a five - position game, isn't it? yes. curiously, there were no retreats, although numerous attacks were frustrated. Fall, 1803 orders are due in on Saturday, the 6th of May!

1967MB press section...

SIBERIA-----The Supreme Anarch today picknicked in the snow with his friends the Mad Satirical Monk and Baron Muunchhausen. As they were eating some bell peppers stuffed with caviar and truffels, the Anarch noticed five divisions of Cossacks galloping over the eastern horizon. The Anarch grew apprehensive when he saw the galloping Cossacks mounting horses for added speed. The Anarch quickly raised a fortification of snow, and began stockpiling snowballs with which to defend his comrades. A furious battle ensued. Hours later, after expending the snow covering four square miles of Siberian Steppes, the Supreme Anarch realised that defense could no longer be maintained. He gathered his comrades together and shouted to the Cossacks thundering down upon them, "WE SHALL NOT BE MOVED". And they weren't. The spinning Earth carried the Cossacks away from them at about five hundred miles an hour...

1967MC press section...

CANYON, CALIFORNIA(28 April, 1967) The Supreme Anarch released a statement to the press concerning the current war. He said "Support your fighting men! Such as Mohammed Ali!"

LIVERPUDDLE- Dr Cavour, the noted scientist has completed the interplanetary cable to the Moon. The first message was the immortal message Alexander Graham Bell transmitted over the telephone when he spilled some battery acid upon himself, " (you dud, this is a family-type magazine. For that matter, so are history-books family-type. Sorry about that) *****"

CLYDE-A state of ^{total war} civil-war now exists between newsmen and vigilantes... The British Citizen's Committee to End The War in Europe has voted to add the words "and England" to its name...

SOME DUD RIPS UP YOUR DIPLOMACY  JUST RIP HIM BACK!!! IF SOME DUD RIPS UP YOUR DIPLOMACY

Well, it seems that after we went to some trouble to continue the series of SuperDiplomacy rules (which were to be included in the last issue) one of the local elephants came over to Dan Brannan's place and ripped them up. This is typical of the totalitarian, fascist mind, which is always yearning to burn some sort of books, or what have you. First person to guess who actually did the ripping gets a prize in the form of a primely-rendered Granstark....

 AUSTRIA IS PRIVILEGED TO BUILD UNITS TO MATCH HER 9 SUPPLY CENTERS.
 I DO BELIEVE THAT ALL OTHERS...NO! THE FRENCH MUST REMOVE A UNIT.

In the latest issue of Glocoria, published by Dave Lebling, there are articles on the latest in games-player rating systems, and upon the possibility of building impregnable 'fortresses' of units on the Diplomacy mapboard.

We feel that games rating systems are all right, and that they certainly form a great credit to their compilers, considering the great effort which must be expended in calculations and such to arrive at the actual numbers that are the end product of all systems.

Nevertheless, one wonders...We rarely play a postal game with the idea that every last possible effort will be expended to win, or that the game is some battleground in which our ego must inevitably triumph. Let's face it, we don't write half the letters we should, for the optimum playing power, nor, do we sit up particularly late at night computing strategies. Now, the term "rating system" ought properly to be applied to systems where the real worth of the players involved is to be measured...

An interesting aspect to the tactics of the game of Diplomacy is the possibility of the positioning of a minority of units on the board in such a manner that no possible combination by the remaining majority of units can reduce it.

This possibility reflects on the victory criterion: a victory is assigned to the player who has the majority of units because it is assumed that this player always will be able to press on to conquer the entire board.

Actually, real-life countries don't fight exactly the way our Diplomacy-nations do: battles are fought at the frontiers, and if these be decisive, the entire nation falls, barring the possibility of a large scale Guerilla campaign. Now, on this basis, Victory ought to be awarded on a combination of material-morale factors- The victor would have to be conceded such by all the players left in the game.

This would obviate the need for a special Fortress-Victory criterion; however, the fortress situation actually would seem to be rare enough that our majority-of-units rules are still valid for all practical games. Any comment??

GOOD LUCK!!!!
